##Conclusion

You get points for creating a title and introduction paragraph (check your word count). The next step is to write a few paragraphs, each with a topic sentence and supporting details, To make revisions easier, take a look at the sample essay and see how the writer builds her essay. See where she organizes her points and what transitions she uses to connect them. What effective vocabulary does she use? When you revise your own essay, you should try to improve it in each of these areas.

You also might want to disallow pages from using plugin objects from outside domains. In Firefox, go to "View Page Info"/"Content"/"Allow Plugins" and change the setting from "Allow Plugins from these sites:" to "Block Plugins."

Finally, it's better to use the "About" page as an opportunity to talk about why there's a blog on that domain rather than using it as a place to write out a full list of all the domains on the server. If you're going to include such a list, don't forget that it should be alphabetized and have unique descriptions for each of your sites. Don't use this as another opportunity to create more links -- just link back to the homepage of your blog or one of your main categories instead. Paragraphs 2 and 3: Give your reader a reason to keep reading. In paragraph 2, introduce your topic with an interesting fact from class or from research. Talk about the relevance to the subject of the essay. Don't just give us facts. Give us a reason to be interested. Give us examples, setup situations, and connect them all together in an interesting way.

However, if your topic is too narrow or boring, your readers may give up after reading paragraph 2. They will not be interested enough to continue reading to the end. That's why it's important for you to incorporate some sort of hook (topic sentence) into paragraph 3 that keeps their attention riveted on the essay. A hook is an interesting fact, question, or statement that will capture the reader's attention and pull them into the essay. Introduce your topic in paragraph 3 with a question or point that relates to something in the world today. What is the significance of this topic? Give us your reasons for writing about it. How will you organize your ideas?

Start with an outline so you don't get lost when you start writing. Organize points logically so they flow smoothly from one idea to the next. Start your essay with a catchy opening sentence or a strong attention getter, but make sure it leads logically to a point of view and introduces a good topic sentence .
